The cultural centralization that occurs through the media is also contributing to _____. Traditionally, village life included lots of dancing, singing, and theater. People of all ages joined in. Groups that sat around the fire and even toddlers would dance with the help of older siblings or friends. Everyone knew how to sing, act, and play music. Now that the radio has come to Ladakh, people do not need to sing their own songs or tell their own stories. Instead, they can sit and listen to the best singer or the best storyteller. But the result is that people have become inhibited and self-conscious. They are no longer comparing themselves to neighbors and friends, who are real people — some better at singing but perhaps not so good at dancing — and no one is ever as good as the stars on the radio. Community ties are also broken when people sit quietly, listening to the very best rather than making music or dancing together.

We should view stress not as an environmental stimulus or as a response but as the interaction of a thinking person and an event. Suppose you are stuck in a traffic jam. Depending on whether you are late for an appointment or have plenty of time on your hands, you will probably feel very different about your situation. How we interpret an event such as being stuck in traffic is what matters, not the event itself or what we do in response to it. Thus, stress can be defined as a particular relationship between the person and the environment that is regarded by the person as exceeding his or her resources and endangering his or her well-being. This definition states that stress is a _____ process between a person and the environment, that the person's appraisal of the situation is key, and that unless the situation is considered to be threatening or challenging, stress does not result.

① competitive
② reversible
③ transactional
④ collaborative
⑤ decision-making

Indeed, _____ is difficult for people in every discipline. Many famous novelists — Mark Twain and Ernest Hemingway come to mind — have written to their editors that they regretted the extreme length of their manuscripts; if they had had more time, the work would have been half as long. Winston Churchill is supposed to have said that he could talk for a day with five minutes' notice but needed a day to prepare if he had only five minutes in which to speak. The poet Edwin Arlington Robinson shifted from writing short verse to lengthy works as he got older, remarking, "I am over sixty now, and short poems require too much effort." The essence of writing, these individuals say, is not putting words on the page but learning to recognize and erase the unnecessary ones.

Charles Robert Darwin set himself two major tasks. One was to work out a mechanism by which evolution might occur. The mechanism he thought of was natural selection, which is still accepted today as the main force behind evolution. His other task was to collect enough evidence to convince people that evolution had occurred. Some evidence came from fossils or from plant and animal distribution. Most important was the evidence from living things. This was clear enough to have been noticed by other naturalists, including Rafinesque, who wrote in 1836, "All species might have been varieties once, and many varieties are gradually becoming species." Such casual remarks by naturalists carried little weight, but Darwin was more difficult to ignore because he produced so much data. One important piece of evidence was that the same basic pattern of bones appears in the limbs of all mammals. Such _____ show that they must all be descended from a common ancestor.

Given the ease and speed at which information travels, every institution in the knowledge society has to _____. This is because the Internet will keep customers everywhere informed on what is available anywhere and at what price. Here is an example. An entrepreneur developed a highly successful engineering design firm in Mexico. He complains that one of his toughest jobs is to convince associates and colleagues that the competition is no merely Mexican. Even without physical presence of competitors, the Internet allows customers to stay abreast of global offering and demand the same quality of designs in Mexico. This entrepreneur must convince his associates that performance of the firm must be compared against the companies in other nations not just those in Mexico.

A study by two researchers at the Graduate School of Social Work at Boston College found that a child's sense of well-being is affected less by the long hours their parents put in at work and more by the mood their parents are in when they come home. Children are better off having a parent who works into the night in a job they love than a parent who works shorter hours but comes home unhappy. This is the influence our jobs have on our families. Working late does not negatively affect our children, but rather, how we feel at work does. Parents may feel guilty, and their children may miss them, but late nights at the office or frequent business trips are not likely the problem. Net-net, if you _____, for your kids' sake, don't go home.

① still have work to do
② don't like your work
③ just follow your heart
④ lose at the competition
⑤ have the desire to be promoted

Whether you're raising fish in an offshore cage or in a filtered tank on land, you can enjoy one big advantage over raising land animals: You may _____. This is because they're cold-blooded and because, living in a buoyant environment, they don't fight gravity as much and need fewer calories. It takes roughly a pound of feed to produce a pound of farmed fish; it takes almost two pounds of feed to produce a pound of chicken, about three for a pound of pork, and about seven for a pound of beef. Although some of the farmed fish that affluent consumers love to eat feed on flesh and need a lot of animal feed, many other fish happily live on insects and plants. As a source of animal protein that can meet the needs of nine billion people with the least demand on Earth's resources, aquaculture — particularly for fish like tilapia, carp, and catfish — looks like a good bet.

① harvest them easily
② feed them a lot less
③ raise them more quickly
④ breed them in a larger amount
⑤ keep them in a controlled place

The concept of implied agent provides us with a convenient way of describing the American _____. The idea of a "natural happening" or "occurrence" is not familiar or acceptable for Americans as it is for the Chinese and many other non-Westerners. Events do not just occur or happen naturally; they require a cause or an agent that can be held responsible. Americans are not satisfied with statements of occurrence until they have determined who is responsible — who did it or who caused it to be done. "Where there's ___(A)___, there's ___(B)___" means that each effect or event has a causative agent. The English language reflects this quality of American (and English) thinking. For example, in English one cannot refer to a natural occurrence of rain without an agent. Unlike other Romance languages that allow the statement, "Is raining," the English speaker must invent a dummy subject to say, "It is raining." The it in this English statement is the agent.
